

March; by KB Ballentine

Rain and wind strip the last snow, edges of ice singing into the brooks.
They tousle the roots of willows, call back
the robin and bluebird.
Day and night collide, until light reaches
into the soul of the land, urges seed, thorn, petal, all of us warming under soft,
softer touch.